Asian Lady Beetles look almost identical to native ladybugs when it comes to color, but there's one distinctive marking that will make it easy to spot the difference between the two. On the black section just behind the bug's head you'll notice a white "M"-shaped marking—that's the telltale sign you're dealing with an Asian Lady Beetle, according to The Spruce. See the M? On normal ladybugs, that entire section is black. These bugs quickly multiply, so if you notice a few in your home, make sure to act fast. Call your local pest control company, because it won't be long before you've got a full-blown invasion. This content is imported from {embed-name}.
