The City Beautiful Movement led to the creation of numerous art societies seeking to obtain legislative means for aesthetic regulation in New York City. This idea eventually led to the preservation of historic structures for the public good with the passage of the Bard Act and the New York City Landmarks Law. The Municipal Art Society was one organization that was formed as part of the City Beautiful Movement. In addition, Albert S. Bard played a pivotal role in the City Beautiful Movement in New York City. He was a lawyer with an affinity for the arts. Like his contemporaries, the World's Fair had also provided him with the idea that a city could be regulated for aesthetic purposes. CITY BEAUTIFUL MOVEMENT - goal was to improve urban habitability and appearance, as well as social betterment for all. Another part of concept revolved around using environmental design concepts geared to industrial technology. The Mall (Cleveland) - In the spirit of the City Beautiful movement, formerly seedy areas were transformed into a "magnificent civic center", which was supposed to be crowned by the Union Terminal at the north end of the mall, on the shores of Lake Erie. However, the location of the station was eventually moved south and west, to Public Square, where it was finally born as the Terminal Tower.
