CURRENT RESEARCH:

In addition to my continuing interest in Kantian and consequentialist ethics, I am also interested in intercultural ethics, which is a multicultural and interdisciplinary approach to moral philosophy, political theory, and public policy. Western conceptions of moral and political philosophy have developed without much dialogue with other non-Western conceptions. In particular, moral theory and conceptions of justice often simply assume an individualistic, rights-based approach. Other cultural traditions, including Islamic, Confucian, and Buddhist conceptions of ethics, begin with a focus on relationships and social responsibilities. Intercultural ethics is premised on the need for more dialogue and integration of these often-divergent perspectives. My work on interculturalism addresses health care policy, political philosophy, and especially biomedical ethics.

Academic experience in a particular field. Some programmes may also require a completed Bachelor's degree in a specific field. Take as an example the University of St. Gallen (Switzerland) and their top-ranked Masters programme in Strategy and International Management. Of course, even when academic or work experience in the field is not a must for getting admitted to your dream Masters programme, it can be useful to have it. Occupational Work Experience provides students the opportunity to earn course and certificate credit for working in the field, in a supervised setting in an industry related to the student's major or Career and Technical Education program or associated with the student's educational or occupational goals. We propose that purposive disciplinary practice across time and space is inextricably entangled with and fundamental to academic experience and identity; the fabrications of managerialism, such as the workload allocation form, fragment this experience and attempt to reclassify purposes and conceptualisations of academic work. Work experience might not always give you the right skill set you need to thrive in your industry, it can only be mastered with time. Higher educational qualification indicates academic success not professional. Depending on the person, their aptitude, personality, and environment; the two journeys work differently for everyone. Education can never be looked down upon and experience has its own dominance.
