Bakhtin wrote that great literature was "unfinalizable," meaning that great writing continues to grow new meanings as it ages. This is certainly true of Brecht, and as we move into a new period of global repression, his writings increase in value. In The Stories of Mr. Keuner, Brecht speaks in the voice the common man, not the grand or grandiose hero. The 'stories' range from two sentence aphorisms to two page allegories, so hardly "stories" at all, but rather like the analects of Confucius (only funnier and less earnest). This edition has a fine afterward by the translator, explaining the context in which these fragments were written - more useful as a forward, but the book is short enough that rereading it is not a burden. ...more.
